Review “ Hunting and Gathering Survival Manual Tim MacWelch (Outdoor Life) “ Hunting and Gathering Survival Manual • is an ambitious book. And to a certain extent it succeeds. However, it tries to cover far too much material for one book and is somewhat glib about the difficulties of the skills it covers. To Tim's credit, he does make occasional reference to needing practice, especially in fire starting. But for one book to cover the basic survival skills (shelter, water, fire, cord and food) and then move on to hunting, fishing and foraging, food storage for preppers, bee keeping, recipes for after the apocalypse, and other skills is too much. While I did not notice any factual errors, and did glean some good hints, I was put off by the extent of items covered. Tim attempts to cover both the wilderness and urban realms. The best use of this book is to have one book you can grab and carry in case of emergency or to have light in your pack, instead of an extensive library. The individual planning to use these numerous skills had best be proficient in them having read about them and practiced them individually for long days before attempting to rely on this book. But for the trained individual, this book is probably too basic. For an inexperienced, unpracticed individual this book is too breezy and too glib. I fear it will breed over confidence in very challenging realms. Tim's heroes for whom he allows several pages each are 1) Hugo Glass and 2) the Lykov family. Both of these are very extreme examples. Hugo Glass, hero of "The Song of Hugo Glass" • an epic poem by John G. Nieharadt, part of his Cycle of the West, a compilation of 5 marvelous, well done, epic poems, was severely wounded and left for dead.
